It was a consonant, probably equivalent to English w; in the Italian alphabets derived from Greek, it appears to have passed through the power of consonantal v, to that of f, its value in the Roman alphabet: see F. It was lost in Ionic and Attic before the date of the earliest known monuments, but it occurs in inscriptions in all the other dialects down to late times, and it was also retained in the literary remains of Holic, whence the appellation Holic digamma or letter. Though not written in classical Greek, it can be restored on linguistic and metrical grounds in the Homeric and other ancient forms of Greek words, as fépyer, work, Aifé dative of Zeós, etc.

The mntual relations of the OE., OHG., and Norse words are not quite clear; but the difference of formation between OE. dihtan:-*dihtjan, and OHG. tihtôn v :-*dihtôjan, indicates that they are independent adoptions of the Latin, although the change of d to t shows that the word is old in German. The Norseword must be of later adoption: if it were old, the expected form would be *détta. From the senses of literary dictation and composition in which it was originally used, this verb received in ME. an extraordinary sense-development, so as to be one of the most widely used words in the language. Special representatives of these ME. senses, survive dialectally, esp. in the north; the modern literary language knows the pa. pple. dight, which after being nearly obsolete by poets and romantic writers of the 19th c. in senses 10, 14. (In MHG. dichten had also a much greater development of meaning than in mod.

German.)

A term applied to superficial deposits which appear not to have been formed by the ordinary slow operations of water, but to be due to some extraordinary action on a vast scale; such were at first attributed to the Noachian or Universal deluge, whence the name; the chief of these deposits were those of the Northern Drift or Boulder formation at the close of the Tertiary Period, to which the name continued to be applied after the theory of their origin was given up; it is now generally 'applied to all masses apparently the result of powerful aqueons agency'.

surements or extensions in other directions.

The three dimensions of a body, or of ordinary space, are length, breadth, and thickness (or depth); a surface has only two dimensions (length and breadth); a line only one (length). Here the notion of measurement or magnitude is commonly lost, and the word denotes merely a particular mode of spatial extension. Modern mathematicians have speculated as to the possibility of more than three dimensions of space.

b. Alg. Since the product of two, or of three, quantities, each denoting a length (i.e. a magnitude of one dimension), represents an area or a volume (i.e. a magnitude of two, or of three, dimensions), such products themselves are said to be of so many dimensions; and generally, the number of dimensions of a product is the number of the (unknown or variable) quantities contained in it as factors (known or constant quantities being reckoned of no dimensions); any power of a quantity being of the dimensions denoted by its index. (Thus  $x^2$ ,  $x^2y$ , xyz are each of three dimensions.) The dimensions of an expression or equation are those of the term of highest dimensions in it. (The number of di-

Dine (dsin), v. [ME. dine-n, a. F. dine-r, in

OF. disner (digner, disgner) = Pr. disnar, (dirnar, jūnare, for disjejūnāre to breakfast, f. dis- expressing undoing (Dis- 4) + jejūnium fast; the intervening stages being disj'nar, disnar, disnar.

In this view disner contains the same elements ultimately as F. déjeuner, OF. desjuner to breakfast, Disjune, and owes its greater phonetic reduction (cf. aider:—L. adjūtāre) to its belonging to an earlier period. The shifting of meaning whereby disner ceased to be applied to the first meal of the day, while its form ceased to recall L jējūnium or OF. jeūner, would facilitate the subsequent introduction of desjeūner with the required form and sense.]

b. Phrases. To dine forth or out: to dine away from home. To dine with Duke Humphrey: to go dinnerless.

from home. To dine with Duke Humphrey: to go dinnerless.

Of this phrase the origin is not altogether clear. In the 17th c. it was associated with Old St. Paul's, London, and said of those who, while others were dining, passed their time walking in that place, or sitting in 'the chair of Duke Humphrey', or 'at Duke Humphrey' table'. According to Stowe, the monument of Sir John Beauchamp there was 'by ignorant people misnamed to be' that of Humphrey Duke of Gloucester, son of Henry IV (who was really buried at St. Albans). Nares says an (adjacent) part of the church was termed Duke Humphrey's Walk. (A different origin is however given by Fuller.) The equivalent phrase in Edinburgh appears to have been 'To dine with St. Giles's Church): see quot. 1680, and Irving Hist. Se. Poetry 579.

A union of two vowels pronounced in one syllable; the combination of a sonantal with a consonantal

Vowel.

The latter is usually one of the two vowels i and u, the extremes of the vowel scale, which pass into the consonants y, w. When these sounds, called by Melville Bell glides, follow the sonantal vowel, the combination is called a falling diphthong', as in out, how, boil, boy; when they precede, the combination is a 'rising diphthong', as in 1t. now, piano. It is common in the latter case to consider the first element as the consonant wory.

(1788 in Hatz.-Darm.).

The transition from sense 1 to sense 3 appears to have originated in the titles of the Codex Juris Gentium Diplomatique of Leibnitz 1695, containing original texts of important public documents from the 11th to 15th c., and the Corps universel diplomatique du Droit des gens of Dumont, historiographer to the Emperor, 1726, containing the original texts of the treaties of Alliance, of Peace, and of Commerce, from the Peace of Munster to 1709. In these titles (as in the Codex Diplomatitius Avi Saxonici of Kemble), diplomations, diplomatique, thad its original meaning (sense 1 below) as applying to a body or collection of original official documents. But as the subject-matter of these particular collections was international relations, 'corps diplomatique' appears to have been treated as equivalent to 'corps du viroit des gens', and diplomatique taken as 'having to do with international relations'. The transition is shown in sense 2, which refers to documents connected with international relations, while in the fully developed sense 3 the connexion with documents disappears. This sense hecame established in English at the time of the French Revolution, and its French origin comes out emphatically in the writings of Burke on French affairs.]

Dis- (ME. also dys-) prefix, of L. origin. [L. dis- was related to bis, orig. *dvis = Gr. bis twice, from dno, bio two, the primary meaning being 'two-ways, in twain'.] In L., dis- was retained in full before c, f, g, s, t, sometimes before g, h, f, and usually before the vowels, where, however, it sometimes became dir-(as in diribère = dis + habère, dirimère = dis + emère); before f, it was assimilated, as dif- (as in differre, difffixus); before the other consonants, it was reduced to di- (DI-1). In late L. the full dis- was often restored instead of diribations. I., the full dis- was often restored instead of di-(cf. Eng. dismiss, disrupt); and the prefix itself (cf. Eng. dismiss, disrupt); and the prehx itself became of more frequent use by being substituted in many words for L. de-: see DE-pref. I. 6. The regular Romanic form of dis- (dif-) was des- (def-) as in OIt., Sp., Pg., Pr., OFr. In F. s (f) before a consonant became mule, and was finally dropped in writing, giving mod. F. de-. In OF, words of learned origin adopted from L., the L. dis- was usually retained; and under the influence of these, dis- was often substituted for, or used alongside of. dis- was often substituted for, or used alongside of, des- in the inherited words, e.g. descorder, discorder. The early OF, words in English exhibit the prefix in these forms; des- prevailing in the popular words, dis- (dys-) in those of learned origin. But before the close of the ME. period, the latinized form dis- (dys-) was uniformly substituted, and des- became entirely obsolete, or was retained only in a few words in which its nature was not distinctly recognized, as Descant. All words taken from

Hence, in English, dis-appears (1) as the English and French representative of L. dis- in words adopted from L.; (2) as the English representative of OF. des- (mod. F. des-, des-), the inherited form of L. dis-; (3) as the representative of late L. dis-, Romanic des-, substituted for L. de-; (4) as a living suffix, arising from the analysis of these, and extended to other words without respect to their origin.

In Latin, compounds in dis- were frequently the opposites of those in com-, con-; e.g. concolor of the same colour, discolor of different colours; concordia concord, discordia discord; conjunctio joining together, disjunctio separation; compendium profit, dispendium loss; consentire to agree in feeling, dissentire to disagree in opinion, etc. In el. L. dis- was rarely prefixed to another prefix, though disconducere to be unprofitable, is used by Plautus, and disconvenire to disagree, by Horace; but in late L. and Romanic, compounds in discor-, expressing the separation of elements of which com-, con- expressed the junction, became very numerous; many words of this type have come down through Fr. into English, where others have down through Fr. into English, where others have been formed after them: cf. discoherent, discomfit, discomfort, discommend, discontent, discompound, disconnect, disconsolate, discontent, discontinue.

In some words beginning with dis., the prefix is di., the seing the initial of the radical (e.g. disperse, distinguish). But by identity of phonetic change, dishere also became desi-(sometimes reduced to de) in OF., whence also desired the disher edited to disher the Renascence these were rectified to disher are the chief senses of dish in Latin and English:

and English:

I. As an elymological element. In the senses:

1. In twain, in different directions, apart, asunder, 'hence 'abroad, away'; as discernêre to discern, discutêre discuss, dilapidare dilapidate, dimittêre dismiss, dirumpêre discuspt, dissentêre dissent, distendêre distend, dividêre divide.

2. 'Between, so as to separate or distinguish'; as difidicare to dijudicate, diligêre choose with a preference, love.

3. 'Separately, singly, one by one'; as dinumerare to dinumerate, disputare dispute.

4. With privative sense, implying removal, aversion, negation, reversal of action (cf. De. 1. 6), as discalcatus unshod, diffibulare to unclasp, disjungère disjoin, displicère displease, dissociare dissociate, dissuadère, dissuade.

5. With verbs having already a sense of division, solution, separation, or undoing, the addition of dis-was naturally intensive, 'away, out and out, utterly, exceedingly', as in disperire to perish utterly, dispudère to be utterly ashamed, distadère to be utterly wearied or disgusted; hence it became an intensive in some other verbs, as dilaudàre to praise exceedingly, discupère to desire vehemently, distautivit to kiss ardeutly. In the same way, English has several verbs in which dis-adds intensity to words having already a sense of undoing, as in disalter, disaltern, disannul.

II. As a living prefix, with privative force. (Extended from 4, and like F. des., de., used with verbs, substantives, and ndjectives, without regard to their origin. 1659 O. Walker Oratory at Some Prepositions there are, which may be prefixed at pleasure, as, un, dis, ret.)

b. The deduction made from the amount of a bill of exchange or promissory note, by one who gives value for it before it is due, this deduction being calculated at a defined rate per cent. for the time the document has to run; practically, the interest charged by a banker or bill-disconnter for advancing the value of a bill before it is due. This is the common form in which banks and discount-houses advance money to persons engaged in commerce; the banker or discounter having thus purchased the bill at a discount keeps it till maturity, when he realizes the full amount. In practice, discount is calculated as the interest on the amount of the bill for the time it has to run; this is more than what arithmeticians call the true discount, which is reckoned as interest on the present worth (i.e. that sum which if invested at the given rate for the given time would amount to the face value).

Discreet (diskrīt), a. (adv. and sb.). Forms: 4-6 discret, 4-7 discrete, 6-7 discrete, 5- discreet, (5 discrett, dyscrete, 5-6 Sc. discret, 6 disscrete). [ME. discret, discret, a. F. discret, -tte (12th c. in Littré), 'qui se conduit avec discrement', ad. L. discrètus, in late L. and Rom. sense: cf. It. and Sp. discreto 'discreet, wise, wary, considerate, circumspect' (Florio), 'discreet, wise to perceine' (Minsben). A doublet of DISCRETE, differentiated in sense and spelling.

In cl. Lat., discrètus had only the sense 'separate, distinct', as pa. pple, of discrerere, whence the corresponding mod. F. sense of discret, and Eng. Discrete. The late L. sense, which alone came down in popular use in Romanic, seems to have been deduced from the cognate sb. discrètion-em, originally the action of separating, distinguishing, or discerning, and then the faculty of discernment; hence the adjective may have taken the sense 'possessed of discernment'. 4-6 discret, 4-7 discrete, 6-7 discreete, 5- dis-the adjective may have taken the semi-cernment.

In Eng., discrete was the prevalent spelling in all senses until late in the 16th c., when on the analogy of native or early-adopted words in ee from ME. close ê, as feet, sweet, beet), the spelling discreet (occasional from 1400) became established in the popular sense, leaving discrete for the scholastic and technical sense in which the kinship to L. discretus is more obvious; see Discrete. Shakspere (1st Folio) has always discreet.]

When the alternatives are not incompatible they are not exclusive. Exclusion is not, therefore, due to the disjunctive form of proposition.

3. Gram. Applied to conjunctions that express an alternative or imply some kind of adversative relation between the clauses which they grammatically connect.

cally connect.

With the earlier grammarians the division of Conjunctions into Copulative and Disjunctive was made a main one. It is, however, of grammatical importance (see quot. 1824) only in the Coordinative Conjunctions, of which and is Copulative, while the Alternative or, nor, and the Adversative but, yet, are Disjunctive. Of the Subordinative Conjunctions, the Causal lest, the Hypothetical unless, and the Concessive although, are also disjunctive in sense; but in their grammatical use these do not differ from the Copulative that, if, because, as, since.

They are said to have been called 'Egyptian days' because first discovered or computed by Egyptian astrologers; though some mediaval writers connected them with the plagues of ancient Egypt (cf. the Chancer quot. 1369, where the word appears to be treated as OF. dis mal, ten evils, or plagues, plagar; see Prof. Skeat's note, Chaucer 1. 493); some, still more fancifully, associated them with the gloom of 'Egyptian' darkness.

[Note. As to the identity of dismal with OF. (=AF.) disma!—L. dies mali, see Professor Skeat in Trans. Philol. Soc. 1888, p. 2. Already in 1617, Minsheu (whose own memory doubtless recalled the time when dismal was used only to qualify days) derived it from 'L. dies malns, an euili and vnhappie time'. Early corroborative evidence comes from OF. and Icelandic sources. (1) The Anglo-French Art de Kaleuder of Rauf de Linham, 1256 (MSS. at Glasgow, Oxford, Cambridge; extracts printed by M. Paul Meyer in his official Rapport on Documents Munuscrits de l'ancienne litterature de la France, Paris 1871, pp. 127-9), has a passage of sixty lines on the Dies mali, beginning 'Ore dirrai des jours denietz, Que vous dismal (bodley MS. dismol) appelletz' (Now shall I tell of the forbidden days, Which you call dismal), and further on 'Dismal les appelent plusours, Ceo est a dire les mals jours' (Dismal several call them,'that is to say the evil days). Here dismal is given as the equivalent of 'mals jours', evil days.

(2) A short Icelandic treatise in a Copenhagen MS. (Arna-Magnæan 350, written 1363, If. 148 a), begins 'Her greinir unn dismala daga. Tueir ero beir dagar i huerium manadi er at bokmali kallaz dies mali . enn þat þydis illir dagar (Here tells of the dismal days. There are two days in every month that in the book-language (Latin) are called dies mali, in the passage (Latin) are called dies mali, in the sook-language (Latin) are called dies not Norse, and must have been learned from England before 1363. In dismala daga, it is probably an adj. accus, pl., but may be a Sb. gen. pl., 'days of the dismals'. Both the AF. and the Icelandic treatises give a list of the dis mal or dies mali, identical with that given by various mediaval writers, and computable by the mnemonic distich given by Du Cange s.v. Dies Agspotiaci': see sense I above.]

A. adj. 1. Essentially different or diverse in kind; dissimilar, unlike, distinct. In Logic, used of things or concepts having no obvious common ground or genus in which they are correlated. Hence distinguished from contrary, since contrary things are at least correlated in pairs, e.g. good and bad. Also distinguished from disjunct, since disjunct concepts may all be reduced to a common kind.

Disparatus appears first in Cicero De Inv. Rhet. 28. 42, applied to the mere separation expressed by sapere, non sapere, or A is not B, as against the opposition of hot and cold, life and death; it is used by Boethius, De Syll. Hyp. (ed. Bas.) 608, to denote things which are only different, without any conflict of contrariety (tantum diversa, nulla contrarietate pugnantia). It reappears in x4-15th c. with the school of Occam, e.g. in Rud. Strodus and Paulus Venetus, and is retained in modern transformations of the scholastic logic. According to Ucherweg Logic § 53, disparate conceptions are those which do not fall within the extent of the same higher, or at least of the same next higher conception. (Prof. W. Wallace.)

On the other hand, notions co-ordinated in the quantity or whole of extension .. are only relatively different (or diverse); and, in logical language, are properly called Disjunct or Discrete Notions.

Dispatch, despatch (dispætf), v. Also 6 dispatch, dyspach(e, -patch; 8-9 despatch. [Found early in 16th c.: ad. It. dispacciare 'to dispatch, to hasten, to speed, to rid away any worke' (Florio), or Sp. despachar to expedite, 'to dispatch, to rid out of the way' (Minsheu). The radical is the same as in It. impacciare to entangle, hinder, stop, prevent, Sp., Pg. empachar to impede, embarrass. Not related to F. despecher, which gave the Engl. depesche. Dependen. which gave the Engl. depesshe, DEPEACH, common in 15-16th c., rare after 1600, and app. superseded by dispatch before 1650. The uniform English spelling from the first introduction of the word to the early part of the 19th c. was with dis-; but in Johnson's Dictionary the word was somehow entered under des- (although Johnson himself always wrote dispatch, which is also the spelling of all the authors cited by him); though this has, since c 1820, introduced diversity into current usage, dispatch is to be preferred, as at once historical, and in accordance with English analogy; for even if this word had begun in ME. with a form in desfrom OF. (which it did not), it would regularly have been spelt dis- by 1500: see DES-, DIS-, prefixes.

nave been spelt dts- by 1500: see DES-, DIS-, prefixes.

The notions of impede, expedite, are expressed by different roots in the northern and southern Romanic langs. The radical of F. impeder, depocher (Eng. In Peacet, Depeacet), OF. empechier, despocher, is taken to be a L. *-fedicare (extended form of im., ex-pedire, or deriv. of pedica' fetter, gin'); cf. precher, Parach, OF. freechier:—L. predicare. This also occurs in Pr. empedegar. But Sp. empachar, despochar, Pr. empaniar, point to a L. type -factare (f. featus, 'fastened, fixed, fast', pa. pple. of pangère). The radical of It. im., dis-pacciare, Pr. empachar (with which perh. are to be taken dial. OF. empachier, ampauchier, dapauchier: see Godel), have been referred to a cognate L. type-factiare (cf., for the phonology, It. tracciare, docciare, succiare:—*tractiare, *ductiare, *sūctiare'). Thus, these words are quite distinct from F. emphecher, diephecher, in 16th c. also despecher, which gave Eng. impeach, and depeach, also despeche, in Caxton depeashe, Sc. depesche. Dispatch, therefore, could not be of French origin. The date of our first quot., 1517, is early for a word from Italian, and still more so for a word from Spanish; but the active intercourse with the Papal Court and with Spain at that date may have facilitated the introduction of dispach(e, was Commissioner to Spain in 15th and 1517.]

manging; the system by which things are administered.

(This group of senses originates in the L. use of dispensatio to render Gr. oikorouka in N. T. and patristic writers. The latter is used in 1 Cor. ix. 17, Eph. iii. 2, Col. i. 25 for the 'office of an administrator' (see sense 4 below); but in Eph. i. 10, iii. 9, for 'a method or system of administration' (specifically that which involved the Incarnation. From this latter arose various theological uses: (1) Tertullian (Adv. Praxean ii, iii, iv.) uses dispensatio=oikoroula to denote the Trinity as an administrative arrangement, i. e. a system of distribution and apportionment of functions designed by the Father for administrative purposes. This is known as an acconomical as distinguished from an essential Trinity: in the latter the personal distinctions are regarded as matters of nature and necessity, in the former of will. (See the distinction between DISPENSATIVE, DISPENSATIVE, and it is the latter the personal distinctions are regarded as matters of nature and necessity, in the former of will. (See the distinction between DISPENSATIVE, DISPENSATIVE, And STENSATIVE, DISPENSATIVE, and as a public to the Incarnation (dispensatio assumptic corporis, d. susceptic carnis, or simply dispensation) as the basis or organ of the redemptive system under which mankind now live (August. Serm. 264 § 5). (3) The evangelical system is termed dispensatio gratize in opposition to the Law or system of works (August. Ep. 82 § 20), while the method of salvation by means of the Incarnation is dispensatio salutis nostre (August. Serm. 237 § 1). Hence, in the Latin version of Irenœus, Christ is called dispensator paternæ gratiæ (iv. 20. ?). (4) Dispensatio was applied to the divine purpose or decree which established the system, and determined its mode of action (Tertuil. Adv. Marv. vi. 18. Hillar. Pict. De Triu. ix. 66, xi. 73); also, by Hilary, to the Passion, as the supreme mystery of Redemption.]

II. from med.L. dispensare in eccles. use. [In later need.L. (hy 1200 or earlier) dispensare was used absol, or intrans. (= agere dispensatorie or dispensative), in the sense 'to make an arrangement in the character of a steward (οίκοτομος), administrator, or manager, to deal administratively, especially in reference to the practical application of a law or rule to a particular case; first, apparently, in the way of relaxing a punishment or penance, which, according to strict law, had been already incurred, but in the particular case ought to be remitted for special reasons; thence, in the remission of a punishment not yet incurred, which amounted in fact to a licence to break the legal rule; and thus, in the general sense of granting relaxation, exemption, indulgence, etc. The chief constructions were dispensare in tali casu, circa jus, circa aliquem or aliquid, and esp. eum aliquo (ut possit), etc. (to dispense in such a case, in reference to a certain law, or a certain person or matter, with a person that he may do something, etc.). (Prof. F. W. Maithand, LL.D.)

These intrans. uses passed into English, esp. dispense with, which became a combined verbal phrase, with indirect passive, to be dispensed with, and has had a wide development of sens
